Board Ulletin

Commentary from members of Children Australia Editorial Board

FROM DR SANDRA TAYLOR SCHOOL OF SOCIOLOGY AND SOCIAL WORK, UNIVERSITY OF TASMANIA

arlier this year, I took up the position of Professor of Social Work in the School of Sociology and Social Work, University of Tasmania (UTAS). I was returning to the state after ten years of academic teaching and research in Queensland. Not long after my arrival at UTAS, I was invited to become a member of the Editorial Board of Children Australia to represent Tasmania and the School of Sociology and Social Work at the University of Tasmania. Whilst I am still orienting myself to this new position, as well as the Tasmanian context, I look forward to encouraging and working collaboratively with colleagues in order to increase Tasmania's contributions to the journal and to the many contemporary debates and discussions that are occurring in relation to the children, youth and families fields. It is important that Tasmanian 'voices', accounts and critiques regarding policy, service delivery and professional practice associated with child and family wellbeing are well represented in the journal.

My own practice as a social worker extended over many years, primarily within health-related services in New South Wales and Tasmania. Such services included communitybased health and mental health, acute hospitals and disability, and my practice inevitably involved the privilege and rewards of working with families, children and young people. My last practice position before moving into academia involved working in the Tasmanian government health service for individuals and families affected by inherited diseases, in particular Huntington disease. People with genetic risks of developing inherited disorders can have varying information, clinical and support needs regarding the disorder they are at risk of developing and its implications. While information about most conditions and disorders is now readily accessible on the internet, people's need for support as they digest and process such information and its implications for them and/or their family can be great. This can be particularly true for young people and adolescents as decontextualised information about illnesses, treatments and prognoses can be very stark and frightening. Providing age-appropriate information and support is important, as is assisting parents in meeting the difficult challenges associated with informing their children of a future risk of illness. When one adds cultural or ethnic background diversity (including that of the worker who is likely to be located in a dominant Western framework of health beliefs and service delivery models), additional awareness is required. Developing effective social work practice with individuals and families facing health care challenges has been important to me for many years.

While working with families affected by Huntington disease in Tasmania, I gained a good sense also of the rewards and challenges for families and communities in rural areas, as well as the nature of social work practice in those contexts. While many families and communities in Tasmania feel a strong sense of community, the lack of resources and services for people living in rural areas, as well as additional costs associated with living away from larger centres, can significantly exacerbate social and economic disadvantage. Nearly 60% of the Tasmanian population live outside the capital city of Hobart, making Tasmania's population the most dispersed of any Australian state. Literacy, school retention rates and the proportion of people with post-school qualifications are all lower in Tasmania than national averages, as is participation in the workforce. Unemployment is slightly higher than average in Tasmania, as is the proportion of people who are dependent on government pensions and allowances as a principal source of income. All of these factors are strongly associated with the potential for increased disadvantage and social and economic exclusion which, in turn, have significant implications for the life chances, health, happiness and productivity of Tasmanian families, children and communities (Department of Premier and Cabinet 2009).

On the other hand, however, Tasmanians, generally speaking, have strong attachments to the notion of community, of shared family history, networks and connectedness, all of which can be strong assets within families and communities and can help provide significant buffers against exclusion.

In terms of services for family support and child protection in Tasmania, significant changes and revisions are currently taking place. These changes to service systems and structures are being introduced following a 2006 inquiry into child protection in Tasmania (Jacob & Fanning 2006) which graphically described the problems associated with an overloaded child protection system. The policy strategy for reformulating child protection services in Tasmania, entitled New directions for child protection in Tasmania: An integrated strategic framework, was released in January 2008 (Department of Health and Human Services 2008). Principles that underpin the changed service approach, according to the policy strategy, include early intervention and prevention as well as evidence-based and localised service delivery. Such reforms follow similar changes to the child protection system in Victoria. Changes to out-of-home care services in Tasmania are planned to continue over the next few years.

The revised child protection system in Tasmania will have many components including centralised entry point services known as 'gateway services'. These services are now regionally-based and have been contracted out into the nongovernment sector, notably Mission Australia and Bapcare within the Tasmanian context. Gateway services will provide the first point of contact for all notifications about the welfare of children in Tasmania; they will be staffed by experienced practitioners including social workers. Where a child protection response is required, priority will be established and referral for response and case management will be made to specialist child protection teams. Gateway services will facilitate referrals to a range of other community-based, family support services.

It is crucial to understand the new structure of child protection services in Tasmania within the context of the ongoing contracting out by government to the nongovernment sector and the significant constraints that have characterised this sector. How well resourced the sector will be, including resources for appropriately trained workers and their retention, will contribute significantly to outcomes for Tasmanian children and families. It is imperative that strong consultative networks be developed between the reformulated services for child protection and family support and entities like the Tasmanian Social Inclusion Unit and the Tasmanian Council of Social Services in order to include a structural perspective regarding challenges confronting families and children in Tasmania.

> Sandra Taylor PhD School of Sociology and Social Work University of Tasmania

REFERENCES

- Department of Health and Human Services (2008) New directions for child protection in Tasmania: An integrated strategic framework, Department of Health and Human Services: Children and Family Services, Hobart, Tasmania.
- Department of Premier and Cabinet (2009) A social inclusion strategy for Tasmania, report prepared by D. Adams, Social Incusion Unit, Department of Premier and Cabinet, Tasmania, http://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/divisions/siu/strategy, accessed 20 November 2009.
- Jacob, A. & Fanning, D. (2006) Report on child protection services in Tasmania, Department of Health and Human Services: Commissioner for Children, Tasmania.

Children Australia 2010 – Volume 35 (for new subscribers only)
Standard subscription (inc GST)
Student (full time) subscription (inc GST)$55.00 pa
Overseas subscription (airmail)
Name
Organisation
Address
Postcode Telephone Email
Cheque/money order enclosed OR Debit Visa 🗌 Mastercard 🔲 Expiry date Amount $
CARD NUMBER TAX INVOICE REQUIRED?
Cardholder name Signature
Send to: Children Australia, PO Box 1312, South Melbourne, Vic 3205 Date
Enquiries: Larraine Redshaw Tel: 03 9695 2200 Email: Iredshaw@ozchild.org.au